We showed previously that synthetic alkylphosphocholine (APC), a cytotoxic phospholipid analogue, induced apoptosis in retinoblastoma cell lines with intact p53 and was also cytotoxic to human malignant gliomas, even when p53 was dysfunctional. Because all cancers are heterogeneous, we studied whether p53 is required in the response to APC in the malignant rhabdoid cell line MS-1, which is heterozygous for the INI1 mutation, the loss of which is associated with malignant rhabdoid tumors. These cells are an attractive model for this tumor in that they are defective in p53 activity and also have defective mismatch repair. Here we show that APC induces apoptosis in these cells in a p53-independent manner and that the genotoxic effect of the drug is responsible for the death of these cells. Furthermore, the gene for the putative APC-binding protein, p14ARF, is not mutated in MS-1 cells and therefore the role of p14ARF in this response was investigated. We found that siRNA against p14ARF did not affect the response to APC, indicating that this protein does not contribute to the toxicity of the drug.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a face image tracking method and apparatus which can detect the direction in which a face is located with an accuracy of 1 cm. 2. Description of the Related Art An image tracking method is important as a technology for image processing such as face image recognition which employs face images. Japanese Patent Application Laid-Open No. 2003-349032 discloses a method for extracting the face shape of an object from a face image. In this method, the face is divided into a plurality of pixels, and the position and the rotation of each pixel are determined. Among these pixels, the pixels belonging to a face portion are counted to obtain the number of pixels belonging to the face portion. However, this method cannot track a face image with an accuracy of 1 cm or less which is close to the resolution of a face image. For example, suppose that the face of a person located at the center of a
