In the fabrication of paper, a fiber furnish is fed between a forming wire and a moving Yankee surface for forming a web. This web is then transferred to a press section to reduce the water content. The paper web is then dried with a dryer section. The web is then run over a series of pairs of supercalender rolls to provide an appealing finish on the paper surface. Conventional supercalendering is achieved using a bank of rolls consisting of four rolls: an upper, middle and lower nip roll and a surface roll. The rolls form a hard nip of ca. 0.08 inches. The nip is formed by a split roll, around which is wrapped a strip of rubber. The paper web is transferred into a softer nip between the upper and middle rolls and between the middle and lower rolls. The rolls are laid across the machine with the web being passed between the rolls. In conventional dryer section sets, the paper web is transferred to the top roll, which has a heated surface. Heat from the surface roll is transferred to the web by convection, conduction and radiation
