typedef union { char * s[4]; int i; } TestUnion; TestUnion test1; TestUnion test2; int main(void) { test1.i = 0; test2.i = 0; return test1.i == test2.i; }

On gcc, it reports: $ gcc -std=c99 -Wall -Wextra -pedantic -O3 -c test.c test.c: In function 'main': test.c:13:12: warning: character constant too long for its type [enabled by default] return test1.i == test2.i; ^ Strangely, it does not give a warning if -pedantic is not specified. I can reproduce this problem on clang3.6 under the same condition.

A: char is basically a type containing a sequence of bits, and is not a value type. char* means "a pointer to char", in the same sense that int* means "a pointer to int". In this sense, a char* can point to any sequence of characters (up to a limit imposed by the C standard), while a int can only point to a certain number of ints (typically a multiple of CHAR_BIT, which is 32). Then there's the type char[], which decays to char*. This is the same situation as int[] and int*, except that int[X] decays to int * while int* does not decay. So if you declare an array of int, it decays to int*, but if you declare a string literal, it decays to char* const*, which means that the value is really an array of n char const (assuming n is a constant expression with value of sizeof(char) or a literal with value sizeof(char)), and if you dereference it to point into the string, it will point into that array, i.e. into a sequence
